THE ROYAL PALACE AT LASKEN.
LONDON, 2nd January.
The Royal Palace at Lasken, near Brussels, has been completely destroyed by fire. The damage done is estimated to be at least half a million sterling, exclusive of the priceless articles of vertu. A governor, who returned to the burning building in the hope of saving some of the valuable articles, was severely scalded. The King, who was holding the New Year's Day service at the Palace in Brussels, on hearing of the catastrophe, drove to Lasken at a furious gallop in order to encourage the firemen by his presence. The cause of the fire is said to have been the overheating of a fuse. King Leopold recently spent sixty thousand pounds out of the privy purse upon the enlargement and embellishment of the Palace.

LATER.
The fire at Lasken is said to be of an incendiary.

BRUSSELS, 2nd January.
The King's Palace at Lasken is now in ruins through the fire. The gallery containing priceless pictures by the best masters and the Gobelin Library have been destroyed.
